

What's The Better Deal?

The world is not getting better.

We're still not ending poverty, hunger, homelessness, human trafficking, collateral damage, and personal financial stress everywhere.

So, to everyone, what's the better deal?

To continue this competitive world?
Or, become an empathic world?

If we want to continue the competitive world, then we'll keep competing, fighting in this never ending cycle of "earn or starve," putting our power into money and indefinitely spending it away into the hands of the very few. And we'll keep trying to own everything.

Ownership divides and separates, creating haves versus have-nots, always causing inequality. With ownership you need some means of exchange: bartering, trading, currency, money, credit, debt and labor. With ownership and money come power and control. To maintain and gain power, leadership over others is established or installed, creating hierarchies, thus perpetuating social disparity.

Together, ownership, means of exchange, and leadership over others, make competition pervade every part of life. And to compete against others successfully, you have to turn off or mute your empathy.

Or, do we want an empathic world, where the essentials for life are freely accessible; where you get to have what you can manage empathically; where there's individual freedom with empathy; and where we live and let live.

More than at any time before, we have the wisdom and know-how to provide for everyone, but we don't because it's not profitable and the very few would have to give up their power and control.

So, what's the better deal?
A competitive world? Or, an empathic world?

How can we change to an empathic world?

Well, individually, focus on empathy. Be empathic and therefore affect others through your own behaviors.

For the world to catch on, spread the word in your own way, whether by art, music, poetry, or by some empathic acts.

The world will then catch on as follows:

1. With awareness spreading person to person, it only takes 3.5% of the population for a peaceful movement to successfully keep moving forward.
 2. As the movement starts to take political seats at the community and local level, local regulations can be gradually aligned towards an empathic world.
- And,
3. On one day, a critical mass of people, at least 16% of the population, will have had enough and all together stop using money and any means of exchange, thus returning power to everyone.

The shift towards an empathic world, by changing the laws, can make massive change go as smoothly and peacefully as possible.

We, the people, have power, naturally. Instead of putting your power into money and always competing for more, put your power directly into society by your passion, by your purpose, by your time, by your way, empathically.

What's the better deal?
A competitive world? Or, an empathic world?
